Friends

They can be found all over the world or in your backyard. Friends come in all shapes, sizes, cultural backgrounds and religious denominations. The wonderful thing about friends is they bring out the best in each other. A true friend encourages the dynamic of growth, the acknowledgement of change, the management of crisis and the fortitude of time well spent. Male friends, female friends, professional friends, the everyday interaction of positive people encouraging others, denote the intention of 'friendship'. Friendship is such a simple rite of passage and yet complex in its diversity. A true friend can sit on the dock of a bay enjoying the sunshine with you at age ten, attend your wedding and give a speech, eventually comforting you when loved ones pass. A true friend can also meet you five minutes into a capsule of your life experience and hit the elusive high note of connect ability within seconds. Friendship, I think, is the immediate all knowing acceptance of an individual. We are lucky in life, when we are granted an opportunity to simply click with another. The click is a certain liking, introduced, contagiously through Karma.

In life, we meet and greet people each and every day. We smile, we nod and we have an abstract connection. In meeting people, that first connection may continue to grow or decide unconsciously to remain dormant and unexplored. The spark that nurtures growth and a glow of anticipation, sharing and gratitude is the gift of FRIENDSHIP.
