The Little People

In places between Lilith, the rocks, hills, water and air, live the 'little people'.

They are elusive, hovering in the mist and clouds of absolute certainty. Comforting in their endless centuries of conjecture and rewarding in the reassurances of their stories.

Elves, fairies, dwarves and angels, the goodness of people, all show themselves glinting quickly in a thought, a memory or an energized sense.

Christmas is a time when the little people can sometimes be seen physically, through the effects of their contagious generosity or felt in the spirit of invisible presence. We are reminded of the magical and not necessarily mythical existence of experiences and folklore stories chronicling a past of mystery blended with cheekiness and sure handed resourcefulness.

In Iceland, wooden elf doors are placed against rocks upon hills where the hidden people are believed to live. Warmed by the glow of the northern lights it is believed that light energy connects elf churches. 'Seers' are called before construction to protect against the intrusion or destruction of elf gardens, churches and communities that lay in the beautiful natural environment. It has been documented that if the little people are in disagreement with the construction of roads, machines break down and tools go missing.

Effective through conviction and always encouraging strong leadership, 'the hidden people' can very well be living right before your eyes. The honesty and integrity with which they carry out their purpose is an inspiration to all around them. These influences show the way to live in kindness and with love.

For thousands of years the tales, cultural recanting and recording of the mystic and syncretic occurrences have pointed toward a common theme. In times of struggle and trouble, the little people represent a brightness and lightness of being.

Christmas shines a light on the legendary benefits of Good Will Toward Men. The folklore of fairies shines a light, the message: good will toward all Humanity.
